The state of U.S. intelligence is "marginal" for the problems that will arise in the late 1980s and 1990s, outgoing CIA Deputy Director Bobby R. Inman said. In his assessment of the country's intelligence capabilities, Inman, 51, an admiral who announced last week that he was leaving his 30-year career in intelligence to enter private business, said systems for providing warnings of attack are "better than they have ever been." But he added in a speech to the American Newspaper Publishers Assn. that "we do substantially less well in political and economic areas."
